...He wanted to be a cowboy

He left Crane County to get a journalism degree at the University of Texas, then returned to ranch country as a farm and livestock reporter for the San Angelo Standard-Times—a professional observer of his past. He left the Standard-Times after 15 years to edit Sheep and Goat Raisers' Magazine and then became associate editor of the Livestock Weekly. Until he retired from that publication in 1990, he was a moonlighting fictionalizing much of what he reported. "Do you know there's someone out there with your name writing Westerns?" a subject once asked him.

Kelton has written many pulp westerns—he got his start in college in the 1950s, composing stories like "His Gun Was the Law" and "Blind Canyon" for magazines like Ranch Romances and Thrilling Western—but he has steadily moved away from formulaic writing toward literary work.

"I feel that progression, I sense it when I look at all my books," he says.

Kelton's best novels are minutely naturalistic, sparely plotted and meticulously sociological—devotional portraits of ranch life in West Texas. In them, he attends to the sensory effect of machinery ("The steel
