Loved and Needed
By James M. Decker
I don't think I have ever *wanted* to sit down and write an essay about suicide and mental health awareness. Frankly, it would be concerning to me if I did relish the topic. Alas, it has been a while since I wrote one of these essays. Something has been nagging at me for days that this had to be this week's topic, regardless of my other pending writing ideas.

Maybe it is because today (I'm writing this on September 10) is World Suicide Prevention Day and the month of September is National Suicide Prevention Month. These events were created to raise awareness on the topic of suicide prevention and to provide information and outlets for help for those in need.

Maybe it is because it seems like the world is spinning faster and faster these days. We are constantly hit with a firehose of information about the news, about the world around us, about everyone that we've ever met that has a social media account. Trapped in a cycle of checking, scrolling, re-checking, and scrolling some more, we see it all whether it is healthy for our brains or not. We see how friends and casual acquaintances appear to be doing perfectly awesome with nary a care in the world. We "follow" celebrities who have it even better. We see how other friends and acquaintances are struggling and we feel sadness or empathy. We read about the latest natural disaster or other catastrophe that sweeps across some far-off land and snuffs out far too many lives far too soon and that upsets us.

Maybe it is the crush of expectations, demands, bills, and more. The rent is too high. Interest on a mortgage is too high. Utilities are too high.
